

Oli has heard about Dan's mochi for a while now. It has always been boasted and praised for being one of the best if not THE best mochi you could get so there wasn't any other choice, after being urged to go try some for so long, he went to Dan's mochi shop. As Oli entered the shop one of the first things he noticed was the pile of pillows in a corner and Dan working hard on making more mochi. The thud of his hammer being heard and it only stopped when he had opened the door that had a chime to it to signal a customer had entered the shop.

It was something else that he didn't really know what to say. He hasn't tried anything close to mochi before and he was unsure if he should be spending money on something he didn't know he might not like. But being greeted, Oli felt he couldn't walk away anymore. "What can I do for you?" Was the greeting when Dan had approached the counter to help take care of his new customer. Meanwhile Oli had approached the counter and looked down at the mochi that was on display. "I haven't had mochi before so I'm not sure what I want." He said with a small sheepish smile.

Dan waved him off with a small hum, he seemed to be thinking for a minute and pulled a few different kinds of dango out and pulled them into plastic wrappings. "These tend to be the better flavors to start people off with. Basic flavors that most other Bun's tend to enjoy." He said while he turned to enter the prices into his register so he could get ready to charge the Bun in his shop.

Oli though was still looking around before moving back to the counter and looked at more of the dango that was on display. He saw one of his favorite flavors and he brightened up a little bit. He turned to speak to Dan again about adding the dango he had found but stopped and looked at the price. It was a bit much. The price was already at the top of his budget for the time and he knew even if he were to change dango's the one he wanted was a bit more expensive than the dango he was getting currently. Tilting his head he leaned forward onto the counter and snaked his tail to the side closer to the Dango he wanted.

"Well it's going to be 300 carats." Was what Dan had told him, waiting for payment as Oli dug into his loose pants for his card and handed it to Dan who turned to run his card through and once he did he used his tail to help snatch the dango and pocketed it quickly just before Dan turned to hand the card back to him. Smiling Oli took the card and let Dan bag the dango up and handed the sweets to Oli. Who happily took the bag and turned to leave with a thanks. Leaving the shop he reached into his pocket to drop that dango into the bag as well after he had gotten far enough away. He really can't resist matcha and chocolate.