

The PNV always wins the game

I believe that I speak in the plural when I say that it has been a surprise the amount of prebends that the PNV has taken to the PP in exchange for its support for the approval of the General Budgets of the State. In short, the Jeltzales have managed to scratch Rajoy a reduction of 540 million a year, an investment of 3,380 million to complete the Basque 'Y' railway project and greater competences for the Ertzaintza; In addition to other detailed demands, such as a reduction in the electricity tariff for Basque industries and more aid for unemployment. This string of gifts that Rajoy has handed over to the Basque Government has left many people angry. But what else could he do? On the one hand, Rajoy had Citizens coaxing him not to negotiate with the PNV not a single penitentiary policy or the approach of prisoners of ETA, which was the Peneuvistas really wanted. And on the other, the President of the Government faced in Congress no less than seven amendments to the totality that were going to overturn the budgets that presented - with 170 seats he had, did not remove them. It is true that the Peneuvistas have always been very clever, but they would not have taken half if the PSOE, for example, had collaborated in the preparation of budgets. Now it's no use crying.