

It was a quiet day at the mansion with nothing to do, nothing to work on, and conversations becoming lackluster. It really was a boring week and Sugar couldn't stand it all that much. The peaceful quietness was nice, however it was more fun when the club members had things to do because she could help out then. What was she supposed to do when nothing's going on? She laid in her pastel pink bed in her equally pink room as she doodled on a piece of paper, hoping that something would happen. The morning became noon, and that brought nothing. It was way too quiet still, so she decided it was a good time to look through her crafts magazine. She went through each stack to figure out what she should do; should she try sculpting? Well, they didn't have any spare clay. How about knitting? Seemed too slow of a process and her hands weren't that delicate. Scrapbooking? Nope. There wasn't enough to start a scrapbook with. When she thought she hit a dead end, she saw a magazine all about costuming and ways to create them by hand. It seemed interesting, so she wanted to give it a try.

First thing she needed to learn was sewing for the simple task that was making a ghostly costume; it was just a sheet fashioned to be a cartoony ghost costume, but it still looked like fun to her. She went up to Baker to look for the things she needed, then was led to one of the storage rooms the held only fabrics, even scraps. She rummaged until she found the perfect pieces, thanked her father, then went to Vette for sewing supplies which she had a whole kit for and gave it to her daughter. With those materials and tools, she thanked her mother and went back into her room and began measuring, cutting, folding, and sewing the scrap white sheet into the ghost costume from the book. Grinning with joy, she immediately threw it on. The eyes had mesh-like black fabric to grant her visibility in front of her, allowing the little Nautipod to run around while shouting "boo" to spook some members, but they all smiled once they realized it was just her, then went into questions about how she made it.

It wasn't much, but the costume was a start to making the dull days a little more fun for everyone. Now the question is; what other costumes could she make?