

Residing in layer four is a very small town of only several dozen tatsukoi. Those on this level prefer solitude though they also understand the need to rely on others for things such as food and medicine and that's what this small town of Chahlee is for. There's not as much to be done on this layer than there is on the other but this town still has a few surprises to it. In the middle of the town there is some light that filters through a hole in the ceiling. They utilize this in that they have their one and only garden planted here that they plant produce for that requires sunlight. For any plants that require darkness, those are planted elsewhere. The plants that grow here tend to thrive better even than in other layers, possibly due to the amount of water they receive in the cave systems. The things they do for fun in this town is something like a bungee cord they have that they use to plunge themselves into giant cavernous drop offs that are barely lit. There is always someone there managing the harnesses so no one gets hurt. The ones that reside within this town may not be too friendly but they would also rather not see anyone get hurt (too much paperwork and trouble and all that). Springing into the darkness, the further down you go, you realize it's not as dark as you thought because these caverns are filled with glowing crystals not found anywhere else. The few tatsukoi who know about these caves will often come here to study the crystals, feeling that there is untapped potential that resides within them. While climbing down into these caverns are strongly advised against, some have gone down regardless. Fewer come back up. Occasionally, guttural noises can be heard from down below. Those who bungee jump have never been harmed though some say that they could see several pairs of eyes down in the depths.
