National cuisine means both a style of cooking and some traditional food. For example, pasta and pizza are the dishes invented in Italy. In Ukraine, they have borshch and varenyky. It's traditional in Japan to eat sushi. The Chinese cannot imagine themselves without noodles.

Many people have asked me about my own country, the United Kingdom, and its cuisine.

Typical British food includes beefsteak, fish and chips and pudding. People from different countries have brought these dishes to the UK, so I wouldn't say there is such thing as national British cuisine.

The British are more known for their eating habits and traditions rather than food. For example, they use a fork and a knife when having a meal or sit straight at the table or drink tea with milk in the late afternoon.

In my opinion, your manners matter more than the food you eat if you want to be polite. So, to me, having no national cuisine is not a very big problem.
