

Audition Script

Whats up everyone!! Today we are ranking every MCU movie ever (yes I know I need to get a life), but for the time being, sit back and enjoy this wildd ride.

Lets get started!

40) The Marvels.

If you have seen this movie, I am genuinely sorry for what you put yourself through. This movie is an abomination. It's a crime against humanity, and it should be stored inside a nuclear vault and never allowed to see the light of day again. No, I'm not exaggerating. It's actually that bad.

Captain Marvel, Ms. Marvel, and two other characters whose names I don't even remember anymore decide that they are going to be the girl bosses and save the world. And they end up saving the world. What happens in between? I don't know. I never bothered to watch the movie carefully enough to remember, and I have a lot more things I would rather remember than this abomination of a movie.

13) Captain America — The First Avenger.

My friends, we have finally arrived at the good movies. Captain America — Steve Rogers — needs no introduction. I mean, who doesn't love a World War Two veteran with such strong principles and such morality? It's really, really hard to hate Steve. I loved this movie. The concept was simple — pretty much barebones, yes — but I feel like it was executed really well. It had the heart and the capacity to pull it off. Is it the best movie? No. But does it serve as a great introduction to the Captain America saga? Absolutely it does.

2) Iron Man

Do I even need to say anything more? I mean, come on guys — we're talking about Iron Man here. It's really, really hard not to fanboy about this movie. RDJ — come on. I freaking love this movie for a multitude of reasons, and one of the reasons I have always adored it is just how much thought they put into developing Tony as a character, rather than letting the CGI take the front seat the way Marvel does nowadays. This movie is a perfect example of how to develop a character in a way that makes sense, while being fully serviceable to the overall plot and premise. It's just brilliant.

So that's it, guys. Let me know your thoughts in the comments below. Bye bye.
