

What a big mistake is going to be the 'Brexit'

I get the impression that the British are making their tea too strong lately. I do not know, I notice them as unnerved. I would even say that they have lost the north. And if they have not done so yet, they are short of it: Scotland is preparing to leave the UK in the autumn of next year. And the Ulster is already thinking of saying 'goodbye' as soon as possible and joining South Ireland. As people from the UK continue to go, the war that we want to declare to the Spaniards for trying to stay with Gibraltar is going to win fixed. My grandmother used to say that the tea envelope should be left for a couple of minutes. No more. Because if it does not make you more nervous than the machaca maracas. That this was surely what happened to the former Prime Minister David Cameron: he took it dark, he came up, put the urns, the 'Brexit' came out and, since then, the English advance but not leaving a single puddle without stepping . Former British Deputy Prime Minister Michael Heseltine said: "Brexit is the biggest mistake since World War II." I agree. When they begin to suffer the consequences of the jigsaw that they are doing, they will want to throw themselves all from the balconies of the hotels of Tenerife towards their swimming pools. Without water.
