

Do you think Career does a good job of educating students about environmental sustainability?

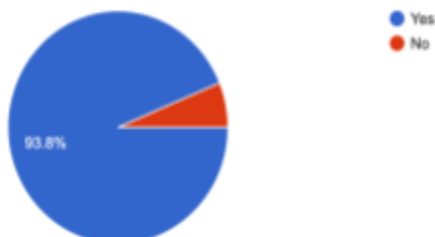

Out of 200 responses, 96% of students felt that Career did not do a good job at educating students about environmental sustainability. Being a student at Career for four years, this was a result I wasn't too shocked about, because I had felt the same during my time there. The lack of education regarding this crucial topic is the first problem that people face in tackling the issue. If more students were aware of the problem and the role they played in the issue, they would step up and start making changes in order to help stop the problem from escalating.

---

Have you made changes in your life in favor of environmental sustainability?

If answered "No" to the previous question, are you willing to make changes in your life in favor of environmental sustainability?

Many students who admitted to not making any changes in their lives, later stated that they were willing to start. This just comes to show how all students need is some guidance on how they can help. By providing them with the correct knowledge, we open doors for them to make eco-friendly choices! My biggest goal for this project was to provide students with ways in which they can make more sustainable choices in their lives. The more people start making these sustainable lifestyle changes, the more of an impact it will have on the decisions leaders make for our future!