

This is a painting of a trail going through a canyon. I saw the original image and decided that this would be a cool picture to recreate, as it looked amazing and it would help me enhance my painting skills. I had a limited color palette, so I was forced to work with the colors I had, and I think it turned out nice. I wanted to create a clear foreground middleground and background which I achieved by slightly changing the shades of the colors I was working with. I then wanted to add shape to the terrain so I also used different shades to show shadows in the grass and on the canyon and I think it worked. During this project I learned how to effectively use my resources and think outside of the box. Due to not having many colors I used my previous knowledge of colors and how to make different shades to finish this project.
