The Sheehan family, Roger, and Tiffany, and their children, Sally and Arnold, have won a luxury space cruise for six days and six nights to the moon and back. It's not until they've already launched that they find out that it is a luxury space SEX cruise, and there's absolutely nothing for the kids to do. Board out of their minds, Sally and Arnold, wander the ship and eventually uncover a sinister scheme that, if it succeeds, will make sure that everyone onboard will never see Earth again. Mysteriously, couples begin to disappear from the ship. The children begin to connect the dots; everyone on the cruise is connected to the invention of a teleportation device that will instantly teleport goods around the world. Their parents are also involved but are too focused on their couples' massages, awkward crystal healing rituals, and dolphin petting pools in space; that their children have to save their lives along the way without them knowing. All the adults have such a great time that they don't believe the children when they warn them about the plot, which leaves Sally and Arnold to get the ship back to Earth, on their own, before it's too late.
