How to Write Lyrics Effectively

Learning how to write lyrics can be the most difficult or the easiest part of songwriting for different people. I myself am a more musical oriented person and consequently I preach writing music THEN lyrics. Most songwriters preach this order, but let's not get ahead of ourselves. In this article I'm going to identify how to write lyrics using a number of effective tips to help you get over your writer's block if you're experiencing that and get you writing better lyrics right away.

As I alluded to in the opening just now, I completely recommend that you focus on music then lyrics. I recommend this because it makes writing lyrics a lot easier for a couple of reasons.

First off, coming up with your music first gives you a precise idea of what kind of rhythmic spacing you might be working with. You'll know that if you have a melodic vocal line for the chorus which is made up of 5 syllables per line, you know what kinds of lyrical lines you can fit in there. Once you have that you can test out a line and once you nail that down you'll also nail down your rhyming structure and pattern.

Secondly, I have found that a GREAT melody line makes writing lyrics ridiculously easy. When you have a great melodic vocal hook which is memorable and which you are excited about, then you will find yourself singing dozens and hundreds of possible lyrical phrases for that line. You'll find that being prolific is second nature when it comes to writing quality lyrics when you've got a great melodic line which you can just keep throwing lyrics at.

When this happens to me, I'll write down dozens of lines which fit there and although you're only going to be using and have room for a handful of them, those extra lyrics are right there in your lyrical book (another important point in how to write lyrics is that you should have a lyrical book to house all of your ideas) so you can pull from them when you find yourself stumped on another song.

The spacing and rhyming structures likely won't fit perfectly when importing lyrics into a different song, but you can adapt them. The point is you'll get quality ideas/lyrics which will likely be of higher quality than a line you're trying to write for another song later on.
