

We have won

"We won, we do not know who" he would say sarcastically Pio Cabanillas (UCD) after elections. And once the results of 24M known, I can think of no better expression to describe the current political situation. Spain wears four colors do not know if they will be able to combine. If bipartisanship was bad, the multiparty system is not expected to be better. In theory it seems that we will be the key to the left coalitions and citizens will support the PP where needed. And peace here and then glory. But that theory. Because in practice I'm not sure this will happen. -real Winners-emerging parties have reached where they are because some votes that come from kicking and disaffection. Of citizens demanding real change, not patches. And neither the PSOE nor the PP will allow an excessive transformation of the current political system. This problem is now living in Andalusia. We'll see if it is not extended.
