You are sitting at the edge of Lake Išmintis. You've been looking at your own reflection in the still water, though you can't recall why.

Night has fallen, and you decide that you should go home. You turn back and go into the forest, walking and walking until the trees clear -

You are back at the lake again. How strange.

A single raven caws from a branch above you.

You ignore it, shake yourself off, and go back into the forest. Walking and walking until the trees clear -

You are back at the lake again.

A single raven caws from a branch above you.

You don't even look at it. You try again. Back into the forest, walking and walking until the trees clear -

You are back at the lake again.

A single raven caws from a branch above you.

Again and again you try to leave, again and again you find yourself facing the water. Every time you return, the raven cries out.

Eventually, becoming irritable, you lift your head to look at the bird, it's glinting eyes illuminated by the glow of the moon. It opens its beak, but this time it speaks in your language -

"Everything repeats."
