

It is crazy to me and always will be insane to me how powerful music is. I will never care a day in my life for lyrics but the sounds alone have this powerful nature to them. I hope people who read this can relate to feeling music deep in their soul without caring for the lyrics at all. A huge example of this for me is Hyperpop. As someone who has barely had any romantic involvements in my life or really emotional hardships of the sorts sung about, the very sound of the song can get me in a mood. Same with artists like Alex Warren Alec Benjamin and Matt Hansen. Omg these lyrics are the farthest from my life's story but wow the very sounds and the way the lyrics and music harmonize really allows me to process emotions and thoughts I genuinely couldn't otherwise. There is a feeling of catharsis I can't quite describe sobbing my eyes out to a French song I don't understand a word of meanwhile headbanging to the actual amazing song that is the Car by glaive. Music has, time and time again been the glue that holds my life together. It's truly magical and because of this I feel so very sad that music has become a topic that people seem to get so hostile over. I am so guarded when it comes to sharing songs because people are so hateful towards other genres of music. Now by no means am I not in this group of people, I have a quite genuine distaste for country and rap but nevertheless I try not to harass too seriously. Why can't we all just be honest about music tastes? I am tired of the same old boring answers of what people listen to. Tell me what niche genre you listen to and which artist you are normally embarrassed to talk about. I would much prefer a culture of people interested in expanding their tastes and genres. I have no doubt in my mind though that this interest in music comes from Beat Saber and the intense emotional connections I have with the game but nevertheless I feel nothing short of pure pity for those who don't feel the transcendent nature of the very sound of music. To wrap up this honestly nonsensical rant about literally nothing I want to pose a question for anyone interested, do you relate to the connection between you and the sound of music? And which artist and genre isn't very well known that I should know about. I will rate your taste with my honest yet kind opinion. Idk if I will do more of these but I am inclined to cause I like reading long-ish documents of random people talking so who's to say none of you all like doing the same 😊
