Aelonis was getting tired of this. He could feel a headache growing in the back of his head, pounding within his skull and the large Rayfin was forced to take a deep breath as the wails of dragons echoed throughout the air. He didn't know when he had come to be the pseudo parent of these two children, but at some point the two of them had come to depend on him. Both Avira and Rosaceae were wailing, their wings flailing around as they desperately tried to explain how they had been wronged.

The pair had been out in the forest as they often were, and there had been a lone deer wandering through the overgrown landscape. It had a pelt of pure white and seemed to shimmer in the light, every step it took was graceful as it strode through the cherry blossom landscape with such elegance and determination. It was according to the two hatchlings the most beautiful creature they had ever set sight on. A title that they seemed to throw around every other day as Aelonis could easily recall when they had called him the most beautiful thing they'd ever set eyes on.

"And so we just, we just wanted to bring it back to you!! You never leave this pond- it has to be so.. Boring. Who would want to live their whole life in a pond? So we thought maybe if you saw them you'd come out some more and explore with us!! They were so pretty!"

"The most pretty!!"

Aelonis couldn't help the way that his face scrunched up at their words. They were innocent, but that didn't mean that the words didn't sting. It wasn't like he really wanted to stay in this lake forever- it just was the way things had turned out.

"But then these two.. These two dragons came swooping in and they just plucked it off the ground!!"

"And they were scary-"

"We followed them until they landed."

"They had all sorts of sharp teeth and were snarling and snapping at one another- One of them was also pretty, but the other one had these big giant scars and looked like they would eat us alive!!"

"It was scary!!"

A long sigh left the Rayfin as he listened to them. "Are they nearby?" He asked, his voice tired as he posed the question. In most cases he didn't care about the troubles of the two hatchlings- but this was his territory. To have others hunting that didn't have his permission was unacceptable.

"They are!! They were- are you going to leave the pond and come see?"

Aelonis didn't want to, but slowly he began to drag himself out of the lake. The pink and blue wyverns before him seemed to forget their upset cries, instead now squealing with glee at the sight of the large Leviathan crawling out of the water and onto land. Their wings were clipped and so while they flapped excitedly the two children ran forward to lead the way as fast as their little feet could take them.

It took only a few moments before he could see the first signs of trespassers. Some of the branches that had been growing healthily for years were broken, scattered across the ground with small tufts of fur caught in them. Then he could hear it, the growling and snapping that the hatchlings had been talking about. Avira and Rosac fell quiet in their babbling as they heard the growling and the snapping of bones, and quickly they ran backwards. Instead of continuing to lead the way they scrambled to hide behind the fins of Aelonis while the Leviathan moved steadily forward to see just who it was that had been trespassing.

In the middle of a clearing, two wyverns were standing perched. A large, wolf-like dragon had deep scars running through their chest, and fur trailing up along their back. Every talon seemed to split apart into two separate claws, and as their mouth opened to snap at their 'companion' Aelonis could see a second set of fangs within their maw.

Their foot was standing on top of the white deer that the two hatchlings had been talking about, holding it against the ground as it protected it from the other.

"Mine." It growled. Its voice was low and quiet, a mere whisper but it was impossible to ignore and the other wyvern just puffed up angrily. The other one was covered from head to toe in a large number of different necklaces and gemstones. Their claws and horns looked to be made of metal and a crown was rested ontop of their head. There was also a Celestial feline that was curled up among the mass of curly horns. They were laying there lazily but as their ride seemed to get worked up they too did. The feline gave a loud hiss at the direction of the other while an angry squawk left the crowned dragon.

"Yours? Yours?? I hired you to be my guard and protector! You are mine to command for the day and I'm saying you should share! I am your King! Vargrin- That is mine!"

Vargrins eyes narrowed at the complains of their so called king. Their lips curled up again and as Maladros stepped forward he lunged forward to snap at the foot of the wyvern. He had no intentions of sharing his catch, no matter how much his so called 'king' Maladros might ask.
