heir of The Underworld Syndicate. He was trained to be feared and powerful. Though he has always taken his job as the leader of the Syndicate extremely seriously, there was always a sense of caring and camaraderie he instilled in his siblings and underlings that his father had not done. This sense of camaraderie served to strengthen and grow their group to new heights. Kōkyo's father was murdered by a rival gang when he was 14, that was when he immediately took up the mantle of leader, just as he was trained to do. He knew what they were lacking was camaraderie and care for each other as a group, that's why he thought his dad had died. No one cared enough to defend their leader and take the bullet for him. Kōkyo would have. No one in The Underworld Syndicate was replaceable to Kōkyo despite the death they faced every day during their groups fighting tournaments. Anyone could die. The fighting tournaments are what their syndicate are known for and have been known for since the very beginning. The fights were for money, the winner would win the money spectators bet for them and the loser would either die or be left critically injured. The fights were for entertainment rather than punishment or atonement for people that were in debt or enemies of the group. All of the fighters enter on their own free will or if their own groups decide to appoint them to battle. Betting is necessary for entry for spectators.

Personality

»General personality: Calm, Calculating, and Callous. Kōkyo lives and breathes the life of the leader of a crime syndicate. Despite being taught that his underlings are replaceable, He never followed what he was taught. Kōkyo cares for all of his underlings like they are family. That causes him to be colder and more spiteful towards their group's enemies and people that hurt the members of The Underworld Syndicate.

»Likes: The Underworld Syndicate, Cake, Fighting (Watching and Participating)

»Dislikes: Any death he thinks it's unjustified, his syndicate members suffering, bitter foods
