Talking Points:

The Series in a Sentence:

I Do Solemnly Swear is a firsthand, unfiltered look at how DOGE is quietly dismantling the backbone of our federal government and jeopardizing essential public services, through the voices of the workers across a dozen agencies fighting to save critical programs and benefits.

Why It Matters:

Americans rely on these federal services every day — from veterans' healthcare to air traffic control to tax systems. The series makes clear: this isn't about abstract bureaucracy; this is about safety, stability, and the public trust being dismantled in real time.

What This Is Really About:

This is not just about job cuts. It's about the unraveling of essential public infrastructure and a dangerous push toward politicization and privatization of services that serve every American.

The Tone of the Series:

The interviews are emotional, urgent, and deeply personal. Each employee voice is unique, but together they form a chorus warning us about a system in crisis.

DOGE's True Impact:

DOGE claims to stand for "efficiency," but what we heard over and over is that it's creating chaos — gutting departments, ignoring expertise, and putting lives at risk.
