You have never been in a museum like this before.

When you think of museums, boring is probably the first thing that comes to mind.

And why shouldn't it be?

Old decaying stuff used by people that don't exist anymore. Issues that aren't relevant anymore. Problems that have been solved a long time ago. It's all in the past.

Most people don't care about the past, because it's not the present.

The vast majority of people only care about now, some of them also might want to look a few steps ahead in the future. But you will hardly find someone who actually is interested in what happened to some strangers in medieval times.

They don't see the relevance in things that belong to the past. It is hard to see any value in anything that seems irrelevant. If it is irrelevant, it doesn't matter. If it doesn't matter, you can live life without it. You wouldn't miss a thing if you never paid any attention to it whatsoever.

But what if I told you that you can experience the past like you experience the world now?

Ever wonder how it would feel to literally walk in the footsteps of a sailor on a ship in the 17th century? And feel the ocean winds, see the enormous waves, hear them smash against the side of the ship, while you wonder if you're going to come out of this alive? Imagine what those people regarded as an ordinary day at work, before the invention of engines, radar and navigation systems.

I'm telling you now, you don't have to imagine. You can come and experience this for yourself. Don't let this opportunity go by. Be one of those few people who actually look beyond what is in front of them. And understand that the present and future are formed by what happened in the past.

Get your ticket now and come see why this museum is everything BUT boring.
