A Homeowner’s Safe Checklist After a Spring Hill Storm

Storms can leave a home looking unchanged from the driveway while small problems develop around the roof and exterior. A calm check from safe locations can help you decide what to report and what to do next. You don’t need to inspect the roof yourself or determine the cause before asking for professional help.

Make safety the first check

Stay inside during active severe weather. After conditions settle, keep clear of downed wires, hanging branches, and areas where debris may have made a structure unstable. Don’t climb onto the roof or use a ladder to get a closer look. If you see an immediate danger, keep people away from the area and contact the appropriate emergency service.

Walk the property from the ground

Look around the house without stepping under damaged sections. From a safe distance, note missing or displaced shingles, visible damage to gutters, fallen branches, or siding that looks newly loose. Check the yard for roof material, but don’t reach under debris or try to remove anything that could shift.

Indoors, look for fresh water marks on ceilings or walls. If you find one, take a photo and write down the room and time you noticed it. A container may help catch a drip, but don’t touch a ceiling that looks swollen or unstable. Keep children and pets away from that spot.

Keep a simple record

A brief record can make a call with a contractor more focused. Save photos taken from safe positions and make a list of each area that appears affected. Include what you observed and when. Separate visible facts from guesses: “water stain near the hallway light” is more useful than deciding where the leak began.

Ask for a clear explanation

During the conversation, share your notes and photos. Ask which parts of the home were inspected, what damage was observed, and whether the proposed work addresses the specific concern. If more than one option is presented, ask how each one differs and what information supports the recommendation. Clear answers help you make a decision without feeling rushed.

Don't wait on a developing leak
