

The novel's protagonist, Gerthyn, is the only prince in the Wystivere kingdom. In the kingdom, if you want to have the throne, you must go into the tower at the age of 15. Gethyn's mission is to save a kingdom, if he fails, he will lose the right to inherit the throne.

Gerthyn was not as brave and confident as his father or the main character in the novel, but he still plucked up the courage to step into the tower. There were many fantastic creatures and strange landscapes in the tower, Gethyn walked through weedy meadows, mazes, and bridges, and finally came close to his destination —the Fairy's Castle.

When Gethyn was about to arrive at the castle, he saw a purple dragon flying into the castle, which was burning with fire. When he ran to a small hole near the wall, he heard a cry — it is a group of food-deprived ants shouting at him, and Gethyn took out a piece of oatcakes for them and went on to the castle.

To Gethyn's doubts, no matter how he called, the fairy in the castle told him that the matter had been settled and refused to let him in. Although he was depressed, he was also glad no one was hurt inside the castle.

When he turned around, he found that his trial was over. It turned out that the oatcakes he had sent had saved an ant kingdom. Gethyn was very happy, and that little move got him through the test and successfully qualified for the future throne.
