2. If your school has a page, it's listed on the left. You can view disclosed evidence and reports from other schools and teams here.
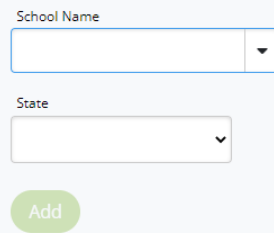

If you don't have one, add it, following the syntax carefully, and it'll appear on the sidebar.

3. Navigate to your school's page. If you have a page for your partnership, it'll appear here. If not, add one, putting in each debater's first and last name. I'll add examples here.

Now you can see the team listed on the school page.

4. Click on it to view the team's page.

You can add publicly visible notes, like your contact information, by clicking the arrow, filling in the box, and submitting.

You can also link the page to your Tabroom account. This is distinct from logging in, which is needed to view and edit the wiki, but rather allows the current page to detect tournament rounds you've debated in.
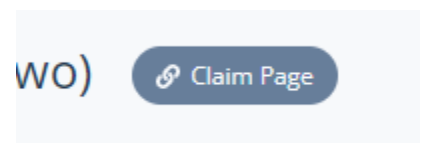

5. Now, let's disclose from an example round. Here is the case I read in round 1, with the evidence formatted into cards.
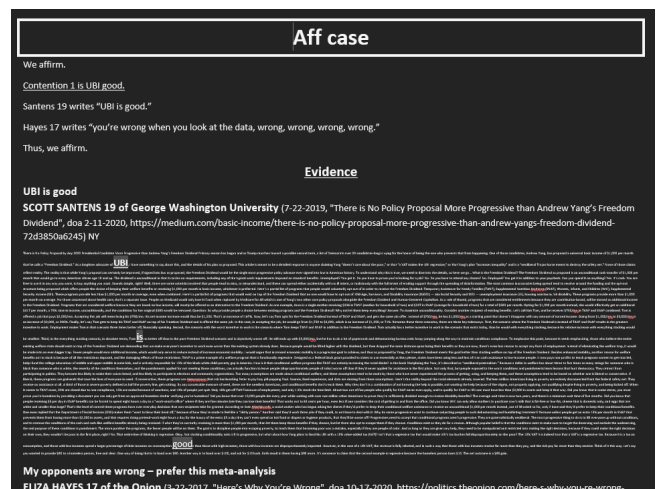

Create a separate document, label it, add and organize the evidence, and save it. Don't worry about the document name, it'll be generated later.

6. Next, add a round by clicking the button on the right.

7. If you've linked this specific page to Tabroom, rounds will appear here, or you can select general disclosure for arguments you read often, such as theory shells, or you can type in the tournament's name yourself.

9. Next, disclose your evidence. You can either select or drag the document into this box. It will be automatically renamed.

If you've used the Verbatim program to format your evidence as cards, the cites will be formatted below too. Use this section to add any additional information, making sure the title is accurate and full citations are present for each piece of evidence.

Cites + Add Cite

Please consider adding cites even if you're also uploading an open source document. They're the best way to see an overview of your past arguments and improve the quality of your disclosure.
The Cite Title should be the name of the argument, e.g. "Sample DA". The content should give full citation information for each card, and can be formatted with markdown syntax, such as that produced automatically in Verbatim.

Add Round

You should disclose all new constructive positions right after the round ends. If you've read the same argument before, you should still disclose the round report, and can point to the original disclosure by writing a note in the current round's cites. Be sure to disclose neatly, promptly, and completely. Let me know if you have questions.
