Personality

- Goat is a smart-ish, quick-witted.. cat. Not only is he noisy, they are also quite nosy; they always seem to have their nose in everything, and just have to vocalize everything too. Goat is quite a dramatic dude, liking to be the center of attention (sometimes drawing it in with loud, goat-like noises). They're not a cat to be caged—this noncommittal individual loves the thrill of adventure—and often goes off on his own, or maybe with another cat to explore! They just love to have fun and be creative, often creating challenging games to play with their peers— games that they seem to win most of the time... sus... either way, they're a good cat through and through, able to settle down when needed. They love to be vocal, did I mention that? Very very vocal. All the time. Every. Single. Moment. Not always super loud, but his mouth doesn't shut.

History

Early Life

- Goat was born to her mother, Cow, with her siblings; Alpaca, Woolly, Egg, Bunny and Puppy. She loves to play, and be extra vocal and nosy. She has always made such strange goat-like noises, which inspired her name. She's also quite goat-like, having many of their mannerisms and loving to play. She loved to play with the playful Puppy, who was always asking to play with her.... she was happy to have fun!
- At around two months of age Goat would ask to not be called a girl, or anything for that matter, going by every pronouns but she/her... basically coming out as agender at that point. He was glad to get unconditional support from his littermate, Puppy!
- Goat liked it whenever a cat named Chestnut was around... she was sort of a kitten-sitter, along with a tom named Tangerine. Goat wasn't so sure about Tangerine at first, but he seemed close with Cow, so it was fine by them in the end.
- Months later after coming out as agender, he would start identifying as genderfaun instead, feeling that fit them the best. He was happy to receive support from their family once again.
- As Goat and their siblings grew, they were taught all about the world around them, the ocean, beach and general safety stuff... Goat just barely listened, but apparently knows it all pretty well.
- His family was great— and that's all that mattered to them, not minding anything going on in the colony. And it got even better when Chestnut had a litter of kittens! New playmates, perhaps? He was very curious of the kittens and was constantly around them. When they started to play, Goat LOVED to be around the litter— taking a shine to little Penny, and often playing with her and (attempting to) bring her on adventures. So yes, new playmates!
- When Woolly would shyly come out to her siblings, Goat would, of course, show faer unconditional support and was happy to have a sibling to relate to.
- After a time of 'peace' in the colony, it was interrupted by the death of the colonymate named Tallulah in a raid— while he wasn't really affected, they questioned his mortality for a while, and seemed to grow closer to their family.

Adult Life

- Seems like Goat and his siblings were finally adults! He became part of the crew, and was happy to take on any task given to it. Cats were slowly becoming less on edge after what all happened. It was good again to Goat, the cat loving to play with Penny and his siblings yet.
- Goat was supportive towards his mom's decision to take Tangerine as her mate. It would quickly warm up to them being his parent, being kind and trying to rope him into their playtime. He was surprised to hear that they were expecting kittens after that, and wondered excitedly if that meant more playmates again.... they were ecstatic to meet them after the birth, trying to play with the newborns (...and having to be escorted away from them). Silly cat doesn't quite understand that kittens can't play.
