

Hey guys, first and foremost, congratulations! I actually somewhat approve of this final two

Hedger- A lot of these bitter Betty's believe that since you "ignored" them halfway through the game, even though it was clear the House was against you, you don't deserve to win. Aside from your competitive nature, please state what you did in the social setting to advance yourself

Jacob- On the flip side, you laid under the radar Jacob. You ganged up with a few others, but many actually approve of the way you played. I want to know what your WORST move in the game was. No BS either, I'll smell it from a mile away ;)

Thanks guys!

Jacob's Response:

Voting toby worked out for me, I want that to be clear. If I had a chance to redo that vote, I wouldn't change a thing because it worked out for me. From a strategic perspective though, I probably should have eliminated saurabh. I suspected him as being the anon HOH, which means he was the only one in the whole game at that point who had gone after me. Toby was someone who I believe i could have relied on into the late-game, whereas I cannot say the same as much of saurabh. Furthermore, going against hedger this early in jury was a risky move. It definitely could have backfired. He could have seen it as a sign of disloyalty or that I was playing both sides too hard, and gone after me. On the other hand, voting out saurabh would have annoyed knife, but I was close enough with him that I could have overcome that. So, yeah. It was a strategically bad move, but it ended up working out well. If that makes sense. It does in my head but I'm a bad writer.

Hedger's Response:

Honestly not a whole lot. I never invested a lot of time in my social game and by the time it got to the end game stages, it was just never going to be enough to make up for early game since people would always be too focused on taking me out to really consider what I could do socially.
