According to an October 26 opinion from Attorney General Tim Griffin, under LEARNS, districts may continue to use approved alternative methods of instruction (AMI) on days when weather or other emergencies require closing schools to in-person instruction. However, according to Griffin, those AMI days will “probably not” count “toward the 178 days or 1,068 hours of ‘on-site, in-person instruction’ required for a school district to be eligible to receive LEARNS funds for teacher salary increases.” That means most school districts will likely elect not to use them.
