When up and coming rap artists want to make a mixtape or an album hiring a full-time music producer can't cost a pretty penny. Most up and coming rappers don't have the funds to hire a music producer to create rap beats. Nor do hip hop artist's want to take a massive risk on something that isn't proven yet.

I have highlight common questions and concerns that most rappers ask when they purchase beats from The Corporatethief Beats.

So What Is A Beat Lease?

Leasing a rap beat is similar to renting a piece of music from a music producer for a certain length of time. You can purchase a lease license for that rap beat from that beat maker. This a much cheaper option of buying rap beats from music producers online. It also narrows the risk which most rappers will face when they launch their music career for the first time.

Most rap beat leases varies in price from $10.00 - $200.00 depending on the lease license and the prices set by the independent music producer. You should note that each beat lease license has different terms in each lease license.

It's very important that you make sure that you read the lease terms per lease license set by every producer you buy beats lease from.

The drawbacks to leasing rap beats is that the producer can continue to lease the same instrumental to multiple hip hop artists. The music producer can also sell the exclusive rights to anyone.

You will still have your lease rights agreements as the contract will be honored, but you might never full own the exclusive rights and when your lease agreement is up, you might not be able to continue to monetize the song.
