Notes:

- I always introduce the breakout by stating my goals for the activity. In this case it would be: "I want you to know more AFTER the activity (than you did before) about "various roles, strategies, and types of professional learning" and I want you to know more AFTER the activity (than you did before) about BreakoutEDU." I emphasize that I don't want them to be able to pass a test on the content, but I want some items to have a) stuck with them and b) for this to become a cognitive connection later. (Ex: "remember that resource in the breakout? Now we're going to talk more about _____.")
- I always point out the link to "common breakout tricks" on the main page. There are no clues here, but there are tips/tricks for helping them figure out how clues might be hidden.
- They MUST break the digital locks before breaking the physical locks on/in the box.
