

Rooted Lightly

A Love of Gardening, Shared

I fell into gardening with absolutely no experience whatsoever. What started as simply wanting to create a small escape on a half city lot turned into a complete deep dive into plants, design, structure, and the quiet joy of building a space over time.

There were so many things I learned along the way that I wish I had known at the beginning — and that's part of what makes gardening so rewarding. You slowly start to notice colour, texture, form, and how spaces feel. At some point you find yourself casually talking about “garden structure” in everyday conversation and realize just how far you've come.

Right now, I'm less focused on building a formal business and more interested in connecting with other gardeners (or would-be gardeners), trading ideas, learning more, and gaining hands-on experience. If you're starting a garden, stuck on ideas, wondering what plants might work, or simply want someone to walk the space with you and chat things through, I'd genuinely love to help if I can.

For now, most of this is informal — likely free or very low-cost while I continue learning myself and gaining experience.

Things I'd happily help with:

- Talking through planting ideas and layout
- Helping choose plants for colour, texture, or feel
- Brainstorming ways to make a garden feel more cohesive
- Encouragement for beginner gardeners
- Planting help or extra hands in the garden
- Sharing what I've learned (including mistakes!)

Gardening has been such a meaningful and unexpectedly creative journey for me, and I'd love to connect with others who are curious about it too.
