

Living his whole life in the slums made Nezumi feel it was unfair that others had to suffer the same fate just because they weren't born as fortunate. At the age of seven, he started stealing from the market. Each success pushed him further, and over time he became bolder, even daring to steal from nobles.

Despite the risks, Nezumi never kept much for himself. Almost everything he stole went to the people in the slums, and sometimes he only held on to a tiny share, barely 2%. As he grew older, he realized the corruption of nobles was the main reason for the people's suffering, and his hatred toward them grew stronger.

Still, one noble showed him that not all of them were corrupt, and that he couldn't judge every noble just by their status. Even so, he kept stealing, knowing it was only a matter of time before he was caught if he stayed.

So Nezumi left his hometown and moved from place to place, finding other slums to help. Whenever rumors about him grew too strong, he left again, repeating the same cycle. It became his way of life to steal just to survive, but more importantly, to make sure others could survive too.