A major question is, how are opponents trying to make a change regarding this topic? Those not in favor of the innovative telescope being built on Mauna Kea have banded together in order to make a change. A hashtag, #WeAreMaunaKea, has begun trending on social media sites and even some celebrities have joined in the fight by posting it. Meanwhile, the people of Hawaii have been protesting. These people have been protesting to gain leverage for their cause. While some of these people just join in the fight to keep the telescope off of Mauna Kea because they live there, they have little scholarly credibility. There are a number of other protesters who cite credible reasons as to why they don't want the telescope on their sacred land. These hashtags and other forms of protest have seemed to be extremely effective in getting the Hawaiian government to acknowledge the negative effects of allowing construction of the TMT on Mauna Kea and has spurred on legal action regarding the controversy. As of late August, the Hawaii Supreme court began hearing the opening arguments for the court case regarding the building of the telescope on the mountain.
