

The 80th Anniversary of Victory in the Great Patriotic War

War is the most terrible misfortune in a person's life. When we hear this word, we immediately think of the suffering of ordinary people. From a philosophical point of view, there are no winners in war. War is a cowardly escape from the problems of peacetime. During global conflicts, everyone suffers: the state, the military and their families, and ordinary residents of towns and villages.

War is a terrible time for everyone, and each person experiences it differently. Some become traitors to their homeland, while others become heroes whose names are remembered to this day. History knows quite a few heroes of the Great Patriotic War, with both adults and children demonstrating remarkable bravery. An example of child heroism is Zinaida Portnova. The girl worked in a canteen for German officers, where she poisoned the food, leading to the deaths of over a hundred people.

I would also like to mention that the Belarusian people rose up to fight the fascists. Partisan detachments were formed in the territory of modern Belarus. Thanks to their actions, the invaders were deprived of supplies of ammunition and provisions. The Belarusian people refused to kneel before the invaders and resisted them fiercely, thwarting their plans for a quick victory. However, the people were still waiting for the end of the war.

Then came the long-awaited day when people heard the news about the end of the war. Immediately, a grand celebration began! People ran into the streets, shouting, crying, kissing, and hugging everyone they met. This was not surprising, as victory in the Great Patriotic War was a universal celebration; the war did not spare a single family. But the holiday did not last long, as people almost immediately returned to work with renewed vigor. They had an incentive to work productively in their hearts. Reconstruction of the destroyed cities began, industries were restarted, and the transport system was restored. Thus, people began to return to a peaceful life.

The victory of our ancestors is a source of pride for Belarusians as a nation, and it must always be remembered. After all, we children are the last generation who can personally say "thank you" to veterans for the peaceful sky above our heads. We will do everything to ensure that such a terrible tragedy never happens again.

Adults and children, remember the price at which the Great Victory was achieved.
