It can be argued that arranged activities trump volitional ones in terms of juveniles' leisure pursuits. This essay wholly concurs with such an idea on account of its safety and positive influences on the child's morals.

On the one hand, it is true that allowing minors to decide their own free time activities could yield certain merits. Initially, this could prove to be convenient to parents, as it relieves their extra burden to find out the suitable pursuit for their children. Indeed, given the young's distinct interests, it may be beneficial to encourage the discovery of their own passions rather than wasting time forcing them into unwanted ones. Furthermore, giving juveniles control over their own free time could render them more independent later on. This is because it is apt to provide them a sense of autonomy, thereby aiding youngsters in learning to take responsibility for themselves. → ôn nhé

On the other hand, I am convinced that organized activities had better be prioritized for the following reasons. Firstly, arranging the young's leisure may safeguard them against external harm, providing the degree of adult supervision that is available. This is exemplified by summer camps, in which the minors are responsible by professionals, reportedly witness fewer incidences of kidnapping or bullying, prevalent in volitional activities. Secondly, this may well help foster virtuous qualities in children. Specifically, unlike independent pursuits allegedly based on the child's motivation, organized activities would likely propel him towards going out of his comfort zone, given their obligatory attendance, thus disciplining him as a result. ⇒ Nội dung thân bài số 2 mình triển khai ổn nhé.

In conclusion, I firmly believe that whilst volitional free time undertakings may yield certain benefits to both the parents and their child, it is organized activities that ought to take precedence because of their safety to minors along with the disciplinary aspects.
