

There are 6,55,000 illegal downloads of Eega within a week of it's online leak. Additionally there will be thousands of other movie downloads, which takes total downloads into millions. This makes the probability of finding the illegal downloader into one in thousand or a million.

But the point is... WILL YOU RISK IT?

If I were in that position I wouldn't.

The choice is yours!

PIRACY AND PLAGIARISM

Many commented that what right do we have to comment on piracy when we are guilty of plagiarism.

Let's say I have violated the copyright...

Does that give you the moral right to download illegal content or watch a pirated DVD?

The logic completely beats me.

Friends, I am sorry to say that most of the commenters don't know what is a copy, inspiration and which of these are actually copyright infringements.

When MPAA is through with APVC on anti piracy process, the obvious Next step would be looking into copyright infringements.

Now if my films are found by them to have violated the copyright act, I am ready to face the consequences. In fact, I am looking forward for that.

PIRACY AND HIGH TICKET PRICES

A few comments justified piracy because of high ticket prices.

If Maruti 800 is priced as much as Ferrari, What do we do? Steal or just don't buy?

Guys C'mon, you know how supply and demand works. If the supplier feels that there is drop in buyers, he'll drop the prices and vice versa. This implies for any product, not just for films!!

Personally I don't know how the distributor is charging more on tickets for a telugu film than a Hollywood film. It completely baffles me. But he is the investor, so I have no right to ask him to drop the prices or interfere with his business model.

MY COMMITMENT TOWARDS FIGHTING PIRACY

I am sane enough to understand that the fight against piracy is a herculean task, but the reality is if no action is taken against piracy now, then the future of entertainment industry is bleak, and I am committed to fight against piracy to the best of my ability
