SUMMARY

Coming from a prestigious clan in Japan, Ran is the "only son" of the Amenomori family and thus the heir to their name. Quiet and introverted, they appear to be more on the aloof side – quite fitting considering their magic. But once close, Ran opens up more and allows their friends to see their more childish sides.

RAN

PERSONALITY

POSITIVE.

Calm • Courageous • Diligent • Loyal • Rational

NEUTRAL.

Courteous • Hard-working • Quiet

NEGATIVE.

Aloof • Clinging • Impatient • Jealous • Over-critical

Someone who has had heavy expectations placed on their shoulders from a very young age on – that's Ran.

Ran, no matter the situation, manages to keep a clear head. They know that over-thinking things only makes everything worse, so they focus their attention more on finding logical and helpful solutions, should they be confronted with a problem. While they prefer to be on the sidelines and watch if they're not close with the people in question, they can and will speak up for others. They can meet difficult situations firmly and calmly, an ability they adapted throughout the years they spent adjusting to their parents' preferences. If they are going to be carrying on their clan's name, they have to show themselves as someone worthy of it, after all.

But even Ran has their childish sides. When it comes to people they are close with and care for, Ran can be incredibly impatient – even just 4 minutes of their friend being late to meet them can make them go tapping their foot on the floor. They expect the same loyalty they give to be returned, which has resulted in them getting hurt more often than they'd admit. When wronged like that, Ran can get quite clingy and mean, dropping snarky comments with their usual stoic face while 100% being petty.

It's not enough, it's never enough. Their parents raised them with that mentality and it reflects in Ran's ways of treating themselves – sometimes studying or dancing until they collapse, getting nosebleeds more frequently than they'd like to admit.

Ran was someone who had no one to stick with themselves for a long time. They struggle with a lot of insecurities and seeing themselves as not good enough, which makes them extremely clingy to the people they do get close to. While nowadays they make friends more easily than before, the truth is that their socialization skills aren't all that good. They do their best! But sometimes they can't help but be jealous, afraid that their friends will leave them.

STRENGTHS

LEARNING LANGUAGES. While disliking studying, Ran has a knack for learning languages, which is why they're fluent in so many. They regularly keep up by watching TV shows in said languages so they won't forget.

KENJUTSU -> KENDO. Their mother got them to focus on dancing, their father showed them swordsman skills by hiring a kendo teacher for them at a young age.

WEAKNESS

HONESTY/EXPRESSING THEMSELF. Ran has been taught to suppress their emotions and always act calmly and logically, as such they are not used to communicating their feelings.

BACKSTORY

Ran wasn't ever supposed to receive the strict lifestyle that they ended up receiving. As they were the second son to the Amenomori family, their older brother Botan was supposed to become the heir. Botan was raised with high expectations – even the smallest mistake received a ruler to his fingers or cut him a meal. Being a very old traditional family, both parents were strict towards their children but Ran got away with less as they weren't meant to be the heir. While showing emotions was still something their parents frowned upon, Ran was allowed to do so, as long as they didn't show it too much. Botan on the other hand had been raised to be like a doll – cold and quiet in his words, someone who didn't care for anyone but his family name. It was scary, really. Ran spent their time trying to play with the staff, though that was also very limited.

There was one child however, who received special care and attention from their parents. The Chikafuji clan had been faithfully serving the Amenomori clan for years now and Dion was the only son of the current clan leader. As per tradition, Dion, Ran and Botan were expected to spend time together and grow close to continue this everlasting bond.

To Ran, it was quickly obvious that Dion liked Botan more. Bocchan this, Bocchan that, couldn't this kid just shut up!? It got only worse when the young Botan showed affection towards Dion, affection that Ran felt like was meant for them. Jealous, jealous – such an ugly emotion churned in their stomach.

But when Dion helped them up from a puddle during a downpour of rain and wiped them clean, tended to their injuries with his mud covered hands – Ran suddenly understood why Botan was so fond of this kid. Dion was so stupid in such an endearing way, so oblivious to the hell Ran and Botan went through whenever they messed up. It was then when feelings blossomed in their heart, at the tender age of 5 they believed they started to feel love. A feeling they were so unfamiliar with, one that warmed their chest in the best ways. Ah, but Dion still preferred Botan, did he not?

Ran was very young when their family introduced another child. Artemy Nikolayoich Konstantinov. A prince. It took all Ran had to pretend they weren't impressed – if they hadn't been taught how to suppress their feelings, their jaw would've dropped to the floor for sure. But Botan didn't quite agree – the heir seemed uninterested in interacting with the prince and would always avoid Artemy.

When snowflakes fluttered from Ran's hand, it felt like a blessing. It happened at the dining table, they had been feeling hot all day due to the summer heat – and then one snowflake fell into their soup, followed by another. Botan's powers had not manifested yet, so seeing this was both a punch to the gut for their parents as well as a huge weight lifted off of their shoulders. Ran was congratulated by everyone, embraced tightly by Dion and told how cool they were... while Botan simply watched, hand clenched to a fist. Ran was now the heir. And Botan was now an error in the system, one that the parents had to get rid of – it was a quick farewell and Botan was off to live with his parents. A small part of Ran's 8 years old brain was happy, cruelly so for it meant they'd finally receive the love and attention they wanted.

Oh, they were so wrong. So very, very wrong.

Botan's harsh training became Ran's instead. Studying until their head started hurting, when they showed talent in dancing their parents forced them to take lessons all day, every day. Nosebleeds became normal once per week or every two weeks and it was only when Ran's health heavily declined during their 10th year of life that the Amenomori couple finally became more lenient. The hospital visit took away a solid month of Ran's year and when they returned, it sadly wasn't their parents who welcomed them back – but Dion instead. Tending to their every need and tucking them into bed, Ran listened to the boy talk about butler duties as they fell asleep. Butler duties... what was Dion going off about?

Ran found out the next day that Dion had been assigned to be their butler. He had even memorized a whole guidebook and while it was kept secret from Ran, everyone else apparently knew this years ago. Interesting.

REASON FOR CHOOSING AZARASHI-HIGH

There were more than enough prestigious schools to choose from. Azarashi-High met all and any conditions the Amenomori clan leader had, but so did many other schools. But there was one thing the other schools couldn't offer – which was upkeeping tradition.

When Azarashi-High was built and opened, it just so happened that the school all Amenomori clan leaders had attended previously closed down. Unwilling to send the back then heir to one of the rival schools, the Amenomori clan settled on the recently opened and neutral Azarashi-High.

Going decades back, this had become their school of choice – so it was only natural for Ran's parents to continue the tradition and send Ran to take the exams.
