- This member of the antelope family feeds by both grazing and browsing and will readily feed on leaves, fruit and flowers.
- The Nyala inhabits dense woodlands and thickets along permanent water.
- It is very secretive and more easily seen at night.
- Ewes are the females, and they are light brown with vertical, white stripes.
- Rams are the males, and they are charcoal grey, with curving horns. They also have vertical, white stripes, but they are not as visible.

This story is missing the introduction. Read what is already written, and decide what should be included in an introduction paragraph. (A hook, some factual information, and a connection to my writing.)

Write your introduction here:

The Nyala was spooked by something behind her. Her huge ears were pivoting in every direction as she tried to keep track of me and whatever was in the bush. I resolved not to move a muscle and let her figure out what to do.

A second later, she leaped sideways and sprinted away from the tent. Luckily, Nyalas run fast, so she was able to get away from the hyena I heard calling from behind the Marula Tree. Life is never boring in the African Bush!
