

Week 3 Scholarly Writing Homework (Topic 3)

- A scientist must choose between using his new invention to help the world or using it to create wealth and power - Weather Control Technology

Dr Jane Smith, a scientist destined to become famous, has recently invented a weather control technological device. She has recently been teetering on the brink of madness and poverty, struggling to monetise her outlandish inventions. Her strange attire consisted of an ashen lab coat and safety goggles that were attached to him so closely that it was like it was on her when she was born. It depicted her as a mad scientist, feared by her neighbours. Her countenance, marked by octopus tentacle-like wisps of grey hair and a complexion marred by the remnants of countless explosive mishaps, was as chaotic as her financial situation.

The scientist sat at the conference table to let the view fill her eyes and free her brain to explore the questions she sought answers too, realising that it was in such quietly roaming moments that true inspiration. She fidgeted with her attire, the edges of her now creased and the stains of mishaps lay silently on the ashen layer of her coat.

While presenting her invention to a renowned science company, Lacklustre, he is given an offer to help create more than one of her inventions.

"Your invention will be an outstanding success. We understand the danger your brother is facing due to his rare condition and we will be able to provide you with the money that he needs for his surgery," Mr Micheal Owen said in a solemn tone. Jane's older brother has been diagnosed with a rare disease, cystic fibrosis and along with her parents, the time was ticking. Her parents, who do not have long left in their life, both ageing with time, are desperate for Jane's brother to live.

To make matters worse, Lacklustre has recently been discovered to be using other people's inventions not for good, but for power and authority.

Jane has to pick between the impossible; to help her family's duty or to save the world from the hands of Lacklustre that is destined to control the world.