

Hero or Villain

Did you ever wonder was Christopher Columbus really a villain?

Christopher Columbus went to the new world in his caravel, which is a small, fast Spanish or Portuguese sailing ship of the 15-17th centuries. During this time Christopher Columbus was sailing the seas and while he was sailing the seas he found many riches and spices. Christopher Columbus should be considered a villain.

Christopher Columbus was a villain. According to evidence 2 the primary source It says "he stole land from Native Americans, while enslaving them". This allows us to understand that Christopher Columbus didn't care about the well being of others. For example he enslaved Native Americans and forcing them to work against their will and took their land while enslaving them. In addition Christopher Columbus brought disease to the Native American population. This allows us to understand that Christopher Columbus was a villain because he didn't care about other people's health and only cared about himself. This is why Christopher Columbus should be considered a villain.

On the other hand Christopher Columbus should be considered a hero. According to my notes it says "He was courageous while sailing to the New world as it was dangerous". This allows us to understand that Christopher Columbus would give up his life just to discover new land and discover the New world. In addition, Christopher Columbus was able to inspire other sailors to come to New World. This helps us to understand that Christopher Columbus helped other sailors discover the New world and find more land. According to a video on Brain Pop. This is why Christopher Columbus should also be considered a hero.

Christopher Columbus had potential to have a positive influence on the world. Yet Columbus was a bad influence on the world. Columbus should be seen as a villain who deserves to be treated badly for the many wrong things he did. If only we could change that by cancelling his holiday and show everyone what a villain is.
