Investigate the World : Poses a researchable question on a local, regional, and/or global, and explains its significance to the global community.

For our big project Sophomore year, we were tasked with creating a presentable research question, and investigating it in the form of a documentary, using credible interview sources, such as professors and doctors. My group mates and I decided to research war, and why war is still used as a tool for countries, even though the costs far outweigh the benefits. We interviewed two professors from Kent and Stark State, and a former member of the US military who served in Afghanistan.

Using the format of the documentary, we explain how war has come through multiple different perspectives, all around the world, and tie them all together to express our main point, that war will always exist. Though the point is bleak, we used our research to point to the future to offer solutions to the issue. The main purpose of our project was to investigate specific regions of the world, and put them in comparison or in conversation with each other, and what we found was that the causes and reasoning for going to war are the same all across the globe.

Here's the title card for our documentary:
