

What do you think about the tea consent video?

If someone goes to a lot of effort to take you out for dinner and a movie and then offers you a cup of tea, should you feel obliged to have that cup of tea?

What if someone says they're going to spread really bad rumours about you if you don't accept a cup of tea from them? What would you do?

If you had a cup of tea with someone a week ago and now they expect that you will want a cup of tea with them again this week, does that mean you have to?

If you're all dressed up and flirting with someone and thinking that you might like a cup of tea with someone that you like, but then at the last minute you change my mind, is it okay to now say that you no longer want a cup of tea?

If you're invited on a movie date, and your date sits with you in the back row and then asks you to have a cup of tea, would you feel comfortable? What are your options?

If you've agreed to date someone, does that mean now that you're now expected to have a cup of tea?

If someone has been drinking alcohol or doing drugs, and says "yes" to a cup of tea, does that count as consent?

What if your boyfriend or girlfriend says they're going to break up with you if you don't have a cup of tea with them?

What if the person you had a cup of tea with goes around telling everyone that you had tea?

What if someone wants to take photos or a video of you as you're getting ready to have a cup of tea with them?

If you say "no" you don't want a cup of tea, and the person with you won't let it go and keeps asking, what could you do?

If the person you're with gives you the silent treatment because you don't want a cup of tea, what can you do?

If you want to get to know the person better and trust them more before having a cup of tea with them, do you think they should respect your timeline as to what is comfortable for you?

If the other person acts hot and cold with you, and then when they're being nice asks you to have a cup of tea, how would you feel?