

Here's an expanded explanation of each response option, connecting them to TRHT's work and vision for a city full of love, healing and Solidarity:

A Hub Site for Connectivity and Resources

A thriving Chicago requires accessible spaces where communities can connect, collaborate, and access the resources they need to succeed. TRHT envisions a hub as a central gathering place for individuals, organizations, and leaders to share ideas, build partnerships, and find support. This hub would serve as a bridge between neighborhoods, providing tools and opportunities for community members to address local challenges, exchange knowledge, and drive collective action toward equity and healing.

An Incubation Lab for Innovative Community Ideas

Transformation begins with bold ideas. TRHT supports innovation by cultivating spaces where community members can dream, experiment, and design solutions for Chicago's most pressing issues. An incubation lab would empower residents, particularly those from marginalized communities, to turn their ideas into actionable initiatives. From youth programs to policy reforms, this lab would foster creativity and collaboration, ensuring that the city's future is shaped by those most impacted by its challenges.

A Community Leadership Council to Foster Unity and Transformation

Change is sustainable when it is led by the community. TRHT recognizes the power of collaborative leadership to drive healing and equity. A community leadership council would bring together diverse voices—from residents and activists to business and civic leaders—to identify needs, set priorities, and advocate for systemic change. By fostering relationships across racial, sectoral, and generational divides, this council would build trust, accountability, and unity, ensuring that transformation is inclusive and community-driven.
