Chapter: 1

Have you ever had a dream that you could have swore was real?

Blackness was all he saw through his eyelids. The sound of his bedroom's fan was replaced by that of singing birds in the distance and a running creek nearby.

So vivid you thought it to be reality?

A light breeze, with a touch of grass, wafted across his face. The warmth of a sun beat against his naked skin, and a dim orange light appeared in the dark.

There's only so much advice one can give in a situation like this.

One cracked eye instantly became two, bulging out of their sockets as they met a midday sunny sky; and not the white ceiling of his darkened room. He shot straight up and viewed his surroundings.

Instead of his bedroom, he was sitting at the edge of a creek, just wide enough to tread through and not lazily jump over. The clearing around him held several small bushes and flowers speckled the grass. There was only one word he could've used to describe the peaceful site in front of him. A cartoon.

He looked down at himself. The boxers he had currently been wearing to bed, along with the rest of his body, were covered in his favorite clothes: a pair of dark boot-cut jeans, his pair of Bates high-top boots, and his black Green Lantern logo shirt, with a white wife-beater underneath that. He covered his mouth with his hand to stop a gasp, and then looked at his hand.

The details of over-worked calices and even fingerprints were missing from his palms. The shin tone was still there, but it was... different. At that moment, he knew...

He crawled to the edge of the creek, and loomed over it. He stifled another gasp as he looked into his reflection.

Short brown hair, brown eyes, even his freshly shaved beard shadowed a bit. His entire face looked like it was drawn... DRAWN!?

And there's only one piece of advice I can give ya...

His heart rate shot into the sky as he completely realized the situation. He dipped hand into the water. It was freezing cold. He then dug his hands into the neighboring grass, uprooting it in the process. He could feel the grit of the dirt and the freshness of the grass between his fingers. He looked up at the flash-generated clouds, and saw a blue/rainbow streak obliterate one of them.

This was no dream... not by a long shot.

"fffffffff..." He knew, right there, he wouldn't wake up.

Don't freak out.
