

I want to start by saying I'm sorry. Over the past 72 hours, I've had time to reflect on my actions, and after speaking with my team, my therapist, my publicist, and my PR crisis manager's emotional support dog, I realize the gravity of what I've done.

I've always tried to be real with you, and this is no different. I'm not perfect. I'm learning, I'm growing, and I'm holding myself accountable. I know I've let many of you down. The trust you placed in me wasn't something I ever took lightly, and the backlash has been a wake-up call.

I now understand the harm I caused. Many of you trusted me to be a responsible content creator, someone who respects history, culture, and writing paragraphs of random words to hide the punchline from the preview. And I let you down. The screenshots were real. I absolutely did all of that and there is no point denying it.

So, my dear readers, from the bottom of my heart...
