Both were exhausted from the barbarous work of death, and their clothes and arms were soaked and their faces smeared with sweat and still living blood, but the priest recalled the surrender as an act of great dignity. (49)	A.	A.
There had never been a death more foretold. (50)	A.	A.
"Don't be silly," he told her. "Those two aren't about to kill anybody, much less someone rich." (55)	A.	A.
Nevertheless, before finishing breakfast he remembered what the orderly had just told him, put the two bits of news together, and discovered immediately that they fit like two pieces of a puzzle. (56)	A.	A.
"That's not why," said Clotilde Armenta. "It's to spare those poor boys from the horrible duty that's fallen on them." (57)	A.	A.
He even began to develop a kind of fervor over the great man's blennorrhagia that his brother wore like a war medal. (60)	A.	A.
"I knew what they were up to," she told me, "and I didn't only agree, I never would have married him if he hadn't done what a man should do." (63)	A.	A.
María Alejandrina Cervantes, about	A.	A.

whom we used to say that she would only go to sleep once and that would be to die, was the most elegant and the most tender woman I have ever known, and the most serviceable in bed, but she was also the most strict. She'd been born and reared here, and here she lived, in a house with open doors with several rooms for rent and an enormous courtyard for dancing with lantern gourds bought in the Chinese bazaars of Paramaribo. It was she who did away with my generation's virginity. (65)
At five-thirty she followed his orders to wake him, but she didn't send Divina Flor and went up to the bedroom herself with the suit of pure linen, because she never missed a chance to keep her daughter away from the claws of the seigneur. (69)	A.	A.
