Response to “Mutant Rights”

Mutant Rights presented by Radiolab Podcast actually a show that expresses some ideas and makes people think. At the beginning of this show, hosts said they would talk about container and categories. After reading the whole text, I found that this show is actually about the differences between different creatures, and how people deal with these differences. They talk about a customs book called Harmonized Tariff Schedule at first. In this book, dolls and toys are different, dolls represent human beings, so the tax for dolls is higher. Hosts want to clarify how people treat objects differently. After that, hosts talked about the film called X-men. They raised some interesting arguments about the film, which is about if the heroes in film are human beings. Then hosts said as the X-men series go, how people in the film treat heroes is changing. These heroes become more acceptable. After reading the whole text, if you come back to the beginning, it's easy to found that this show is actually about contain the differences between human beings even between different species. What's more, this show also taught us to treat others equally.
