

Episode 217

Suda51 and Shinji Mikami got together to talk about Japan's CERO system of games classification. They've raised some excellent points about the inconsistencies in the system.

Humans don't like the heat much. New research shows that the fatal limit for temperature and humidity might be much lower than expected.

Jenna Ortega thinks more women-led franchises should be original IPs, not gender flipped traditionally male roles. This take is certainly not controversial and won't lead to heated arguments in comment sections around the internet.

Messed Up Moment in Nerdomb #25 : Dr. Stone Is Detached : Few things are scarier than being adrift in space. Until 2013's Gravity, most of us didn't have to think about such an event. But now we can thank the scene where Dr. Ryan Stone (Sandra Bullock) tumbles through oblivion for giving us yet another existential phobia. This occurs while a team of astronauts are on a spacewalk to service the Hubble Telescope. The site gets hit by debris from a destroyed satellite, which knocks Stone into space. There she spins, for a terrifying amount of time, with no force to stop her. Without a heroic rescue effort from her gas-propelled coworker, Stone would have kept tumbling until she fried or asphyxiated.

Look ... up in the sky ... it's a bird ... it's a plane ... it's ... it's ... nah, I don't know what it is, but on this day in 1981 (in Portugal) a little something called Supersonic Man enjoyed a release in theaters. Written (in part) and directed by Juan Piquer Simón, the film starred Antonio Cantafora, Cameron Mitchell, and José Luis Ayestarán. Here's the plot summary:

"An alien, "Supersonic Man," is sent to Earth to thwart the plans of evil men who would destroy the galaxy itself with their weapons. Only his superpowers, which include flight, bulletproof skin, and the ability to turn guns into bananas, can save Earth from destruction."
