That's effectively what the Ninth Circuit decided in Fields v. Palmdale School District, a 2005 case in which parents argued that the school district violated their rights by giving elementary school students a questionnaire that included sensitive sexual topics, without parents' knowledge or consent. The Ninth Circuit ruled against the parents, stating that parents' right to control their children's education—a right long recognized in common law and explicitly affirmed by the Supreme Court in Meyer v. Nebraska and Pierce v. Society of Sisters—"does not extend beyond the threshold of the school door."
