Choosing the Right Pet Food

With so many choices on the market, it can be very difficult for new pet owners to choose the right pet food. The choices are so many, and each one claims that it is the best for your particular pet. The truth, however, can be rather shocking. It is actually common knowledge now that many of the types of pet foods on the market are not so healthy and can actually harm your pet. You need to learn what the right pet food is for your particular pet.

First, you need to determine if your pet has special dietary needs. For example, long haired indoor cats will need a special formula that helps them naturally control hairballs, while overweight dogs will need a special formula that helps them get back and maintain a healthy weight. The best thing that you can do is talk to your veterinarian and have your pet tested and evaluated to figure out what your new friend may need. The pet food that your veterinarian recommends will deal with the most important issues that your pet may have first, if any.

Your next step is to figure out what type of nutrition that you desire for your pet. You can choose the all-natural varieties, organic varieties, or you can even make your own food for your pet, depending of course on what type of pet that you have. All-natural foods will be made with only the best ingredients, like real meats, vegetables, and there will not be any preservatives, artificial flavors, or other chemicals that can hurt your pet. Organic pet food is made with ingredients that are not treated with any type of pesticides. Making your own foods is typically reserved for cats and dogs because it contains real meats and vegetables that you prepare.

Another thing to consider is the consistency of the food that you want to feed your pet. For most pets, there are a variety of options. For cats and dogs, you can choose moist chunk foods, puree type canned foods, or the dry kibble bagged foods. For other types of pets, like rabbits and birds, you can choose the typical pet food varieties for them, like seed and pellets, but there are also special foods that will contain other ingredients that a specific species will like. For example, birds tend to like nuts and small fruits while rabbits like pieces of fruits, vegetables, and alfalfa sprouts
