

Emily Pinkerton, Biographies

SHORT (150 words)

Emily Pinkerton is a folk songwriter who is rooted in tradition and unafraid of reinvention. A founding member of old-time trio The Early Mays (and an occasional composer of chamber music), her creative output is expansive, but always intimate. She prizes connection over spectacle. In 2018 she moved from Pittsburgh to Albany to share this energy and experience with music industry students at The College of Saint Rose. As rhythms of life change, so has Emily's music. This year, she set down her banjo and returned to the piano to record a collection she calls "Quiet Anthems." After years away from the instrument, the piano became a place of comfort and permission: safe enough to tell hard stories. These are women's stories—but they are also for anyone who has lost the ability to speak, whose voice has been softened, diminished, or denied.

MEDIUM (350 words)

Emily Pinkerton is a folk songwriter who is rooted in tradition and unafraid of reinvention. A founding member of old-time trio The Early Mays (and an occasional composer of chamber music), her creative output is expansive, but always intimate. She prizes connection and community over spectacle. In 2018 she moved from Pittsburgh to Albany to share this energy and experience with music industry students at The College of Saint Rose.

As rhythms of life change, so has Emily's music. This year, she set down her banjo and returned to the piano to record a collection she calls "Quiet Anthems." After years away from the instrument, the piano became a place of comfort and permission: safe enough to tell hard stories. "These are women's stories" she says, "but they are also for anyone who has lost the ability to speak, whose voice has been softened, diminished, or denied."

This album invites slowness—an intentional refusal to rush meaning or perform healing. "Making an album often feels like climbing a mountain. But as my life became crowded with challenges, I needed simplicity. Just me with the piano, trying to find a way for the storms inside to reach the surface." The result is a collection of songs whose gentle delivery belies the giant feelings beneath. And it's been lovingly co-produced with sound engineer Sam Torres and composer/pianist Sophia Vastek who will host the release at Troy Listening Room on April 18. "I'm so, so happy with the warmth of the mixes and. It's right in tune with lyrics, like an immersion in deep inner dialogue." Song videos for "Quiet Anthems" will also highlight new artwork from longtime collaborator Joanne Wiggins: woven sculptures of paper that echo the starkness of Emily's lyrics. "A penetrating solitude runs through these songs, but in the process of putting the album together, I've been sustained at every turn by friends in Pittsburgh and in Albany."

As Emily releases these songs into the world, she does so with care, community, and the hope that they will find those who need them, exactly when they are ready to be heard.

LONG (500 words)

Emily Pinkerton is a folk songwriter who is rooted in tradition and unafraid of reinvention. A founding member of old-time trio The Early Mays (and an occasional composer of chamber music), her creative output is expansive, but always intimate. She prizes connection and community over spectacle. A lifelong student and teacher of music, in 2018 she moved from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania to Albany, New York to share this energy and experience with music industry students at The College of Saint Rose.

As rhythms of life have changed, so has Emily's music. This year, she set down her banjo and returned to the piano to record a collection she calls "Quiet Anthems." These songs are unguarded conversations—music that feels like sitting with an old friend in a safe room. After years away from the instrument, the piano became a place of comfort and permission: safe enough to tell hard stories. Some are her own. Some belong to others.

In the song, titled: "Not a Game," Emily takes you on a journey of exploring the difficult process of starting to speak again:

*It's been so long
since we sat down together
I walk around
more than a bit off-center
Too scared to make a sound
Worried my voice might fall right out and hit the ground*

"These are women's stories—but they are also for anyone who has lost the ability to speak, whose voice has been softened, diminished, or denied," Emily says. The lyrics—that begin as a patchwork of personal experiences—unexpectedly open into a larger cultural landscape, reminding us how private truth often echoes collective experience.

This album invites slowness—an intentional refusal to rush meaning or perform healing. "Making an album often feels like climbing a mountain," Emily explains. "But as my life became crowded with challenges, I needed simplicity. Just me with the piano, trying to find a way for the storms inside to reach the surface."

The result is a collection of songs whose gentle delivery belies the giant feelings beneath. The album features live takes from recording sessions in a beautiful space with a beautiful instrument. And according to Emily, it's been lovingly co-produced with sound engineer/composer Sam Torres (Polymouth Mastering) and composer/pianist Sophia Vastek (Sova) who will host the release at Troy Listening Room located in Troy, New York on April 18.

“I’m so, so happy with the warmth of the mixes,” Emily adds. “It’s right in tune with the lyrics, like an immersion in deep inner dialogue.” Song videos for “Quiet Anthems” will also highlight new artwork from longtime collaborator Joanne Wiggins. Wiggins’ woven sculptures of paper echo the starkness of the album’s lyrics. “A penetrating solitude runs through these songs, but in the process of putting the album together, I’ve been sustained at every turn by friends in Pittsburgh and in Albany.” Emily said.

As Emily releases these songs into the world, she does so with care, community, and the hope that they will find those who need them, exactly when they are ready to be heard.

Additional information:

Emily is co-founder and member of acclaimed folk trio The Early Mays. The group has earned a #1 debut on the National Folk DJ Charts, performed on NPR’s Mountain Stage twice, and won the International Acoustic Music Award for Best Group/Duo. As a composer, Emily has received grants from New York Council on the Arts and New Music USA, and her folk opera Looking for Violeta earned rave reviews at Pittsburgh’s Quantum Theatre.

Emily received her Ph.D. in Ethnomusicology and Master’s in Ethnomusicology from the University of Texas at Austin; and her Bachelor’s degree in Music, Spanish, and French from Butler University. Prior to joining the ENL Department at Albany High School, Emily served as associate professor in the Music Industry Department focused on Songwriting and Composition at the College of Saint Rose. She also served as ethnomusicology instructor at the University of Pittsburgh from 2007 to 2018. A Spanish translation of her work on South American folk music was published with support from the Chilean National Council of Culture, Arts and Heritage this spring.