3. Planning Action-Oriented Programs (with Dr. Toby Jenkins-Henry & Dr. Daniel Soodjinda)
 - a. Tessa Johnson: Could you share your experience as previous co-chairs for AERA and developing programming?
 - i. TJH: current committee excited about new and exciting ideas; interested in centering current events; complicating how we have discussion; how can we be more action oriented and heed Dr. Harper's call to accountability? People should leave excited. Attending different conferences outside of your discipline can be enlightening
 - ii. DS: General consensus in how all actions should related back to overall theme of accountability
 - b. Dre Abeita: What suggestions do you have for innovative engagement via Zoom?
 - i. DS: Try to build in tools that allow people's voices to be heard that go beyond "do you have a question or comment?" Padlet (real time electronic bulletin board); Instead of 'sharing screen' send the link individually; polling features, assessments, break out rooms (give attendants a task and a google doc that you can also see as they are typing their responses; you can also provide feedback that way as well); Airpod
 - ii. TJH: Evaluate past online events and figure out what made them successful or not
 - iii. Other Resources: Ahaslides, Kahoot, Nearpod, provide a platform for colleagues (especially grad students) who are scholars in online learning
 - c. Anisha Singh: What is an example of action oriented programming that we can draw upon for inspiration?
 - i. TJH: Emphasize the particular call(s) to action. Include in your presentation, have on hand and be willing to share organizations and additional information with audience members; Sean Harper "changing people's lives not only changing people's minds" Researchers talk about their next action steps for their work moving from a "study to an intervention"
 - ii. DS: Google form where people can note their future engagement. Provide examples and resources to choose from (3 things to read, 2 things to watch, 1 thing to do) Provide a space for people to add their email to later follow up on respondent's stated actions
