

THE SMALL HOUSE

This house is a miniature house.
It is full of strange faces, nearly all of them sad.

They are not ghosts, or trying to become ghosts, but their bodies are invisible, and they float about like black flowers, on invisible stems.

When they speak, they speak in whispers, or small cries, and they're always moving from here to there, from room to room, up and down the stairs.

The closets are full of their things, all their past belongings, still wrapped, like unopened presents,
and their pictures are on the walls, looking down, or vaguely weeping.

All the doors and windows are closed.
No one can get out or in.

I am not at home with them,
these strangers,
yet feel an odd kinship with their ghostly flutterings, and keep that miniature house tucked in my pocket, safe, like a small church, a sanctuary for something I might have known-- and all those impossible grievings.
