DESCRIPTION

Linny is the type who is efficient at his job, but only enough to do the bare minimum for it. His main goal in life is to retire somewhere nice and safe, with enough money to keep his gaming addiction and character merch funded well into his dying day.

(Though, if he enjoys working with someone well enough, he'd tend to do just a bit more for them, under the excuse of 'wanting to stay ahead in efficiency' and 'not making trouble for himself'.)

One could even say his main goal in life is to die surrounded by everything he loved- mainly plushies and merchandise of Deadbear Dad, a character mascot from a game which has long since gone out of service.

His demeanor may come off as serious and standoffish- perhaps a bit on the rude side- unless you know of or mention Deadbear Dad.

For most of Linny's life he had nothing to strive for, in particular- going through the motions of getting a basic education and landing temporary jobs to jump from paycheck to paycheck. He would spend a good few decades doing so, only getting by with good reviews and supervisors telling him he'd make it big somewhere if he just got lucky.

Make it where, exactly? Was there a purpose out there worth seeking out, for someone like him? It wasn't a good reason to keep going, but Linny found it more convenient and marginally more appealing than... well. Dying immediately, he supposes.

Everything would change when he walks past a flimsy cardboard cutout of a pink teddy bear with X's for eyes, swaying in the wind by a dumpster he always sees on his way home everyday.

The soggy cardboard... the faded pink... the name squiggled in a cutesy font by the base- Deadbear Dad, right next to the logo of the franchise it probably belonged to.

It had been a particularly grueling day at work, then. And Linny looked at this cardboard cutout of a bear- marked with its company's brand, worked to the bone and tossed aside, and found himself experiencing... epiphany. Kinship. Fear.

Was he bound to become like this bear, someday? Forgotten, tossed aside? Never amounting to anything after working himself to the bone for people who gave a rat's ass about him? Well... at the very least, Linny wasn't going to leave the poor thing alone. They had each other, now, for better or worse.

He'd fish out the cutout from the dumpster, taking it home, and spend a good amount of time researching the defunct game and its unfortunate mascot. (Apparently it was from something called Underland Amnesia- a game from a company that has just recently gone bankrupt, its latest installment a gacha game that had just ceased service barely a year ago). Then he would spend another good few hours combing through listings of old videos, merchandise, promotional goods, and auctions.

He had found his purpose in living and working, in a creature that has long since faded from the public consciousness. And everything he did, from then on- however grueling, or unreasonable, even if it took him to the ends of the Earth- he did for Deadbear Dad.

Better late than never.

TRIVIA

- Linny has some limited tech knowhow from his old jobs, which he uses for when he buys off old consoles to restore for playing older installments of Underland Amnesia.
- Underland Amnesia started as a multi-installment survival horror game which could be described as Silent Hill with Dangan Ronpa Sensibilities, from which Deadbear Dad was a promotional mascot for. It got a mobile gacha game released that Linny wasn't able to get to, in time.
- Linny has also become a bit of a weeaboo, discovering fresh new obsessions after Deadbear Dad from fashion and lifestyle changes to other games, though most of them are Deadbear Dad adjacent in some way.

- Linny's parents died of old age. He had been the family's sole provider for a good chunk of their final decades, but never found a purpose beyond taking care of them.
- He has dreams of marrying Deadbear Dad after seeing gijinka art from the official artist.
